43. What problem does ethics pose to those believe in determinism?

Ethics assumes that people have a choice. Human beings are not held morally culpable if they are compelled to act immorally, nor are they praised if they are compelled to act morally. We are held morally responsible for what we freely choose to do or not to do. However, if determinism is true, then people do not control their own actions. Our actions are just the inevitable result of prior conditions. If determinism is true, then human beings cannot be held morally responsible for their actions? [13.3]

Most Postmodernists are able to tolerate privatized religion because it individualizes truth. However, Postmodernists find organized religion dangerous because it tends to promote a metanarrative that includes a social agenda. Postmodernism considers all metanarratives to be oppressive, thus they are opposed to institutions that claim to have objective truth about the world. [13.5]
